

Randall EBERTS is the President of the W.E. Upjohn Institute for Employment Research, an independent non-profit research organisation that conducts research on policy-relevant employment and regional economic issues. His primary areas of research interest include job training, education, low-wage workers, and the evaluation of workforce programs. Recently, he has worked with the US Department of Labor to develop and implement a framework for adjusting national, state, and local performance targets for the workforce system. He has also collaborated with the OECD on issues related to partnerships between local economic development and workforce development agencies. He has published numerous articles on those topics and has co-authored several books. He earned a Ph.D. in economics from Northwestern University.
